A New Approach to Childcare

Bernadette Raichle

"A comprehensive guide to a new way of working with out-of-home care of young children from an anthroposophical perspective. Part One gives a picture of how the day nursery can support the development of the child through an understanding of the fourfold human sheaths, emulating the archetypal home. Part Two goes into further detail about practical matters, including food, sleep, festivals, and more. Includes examples from the author's groundbreaking work at Awhina Day Nursery and Kindergarten in New Zealand, as well as charming photographs of the Awhina children."

"This book is about a new approach to childcare based on twenty-five years of practice from an anthroposophical understanding of the human being. It is concerned with what is involved in providing support of the child and family in the day nursery, based on the understanding of the archetypal home and the homemaker. The focus is on the practices at Awhina Day Nursery and Kindergarten in New Zealand. What spoke to me was the consciousness with which the practices were penetrated in order to protect the development of body, soul and spirit in the most healthy way."
